Mones says...

The need around us is so great. There is homelessness, too much for a town like ours. Youth drug culture is rife, and it seems that the youth are starting younger and younger as the years go by. It seems that there is total disenchantment with Christian faith and what it has to offer to society today.

In fact, most cultural commentators are speaking about a post Christian society, but, truth to be told, a better term to be used is 'post Christendom society'. For it is not that people are not interested in Christianity, but rather after so many years of church and Christianity as a majority, a seeming partnership between state and religion (in which Jesus was lost and was unable to be seen), and in many circles a return to legalism, a rebellion has taken place. Furthermore with each successive generation the rebellion and alienation seems to get stronger and deeper.

In the meantime the church seemed to be asleep, unaware and at some points confused as to how to articulate its role within the new landscape. In response to this and in attempt to deal with the new challenge church either became too liberal, super intellectual/rational, ultra-conservative or super charismatic.

To win society today we do need to understand the liberal driving force that the individual matters greatly to God and so he or she must matter greatly to the church. We need to understand the rational intellectual church, that understanding and reason is so important and is a gift of God to each one of us, to be used to understand life, God and His requirements of us. We need to understand the ultra-conservative insistence that scripture is God's Word in which He reveals His character and His requirements for our lives. We need to understand the spiritual nature of our faith and life, and to expect the spiritual that goes beyond intellect and reason to be as real as our intellect and reason.

Instead of choosing one form over another and think that the answer lies there, we need to have a blend of all four, pursuing at times a jagged edge walk, a walk that is costly and difficult, but a walk that has the potential to produce much fruit and once again result in the transformation and healing of our culture and society.

"If my people, who are called by my name, will humble themselves and pray and seek my face and turn from their wicked ways, then I will hear from heaven, and I will forgive their sin and will heal their land."
2 Chronicles 7:14 (NIV)
